I currently own an electrical contracting company that specializes in new residential construction. The demand for installation of electric car chargers has steadily increased as cars have become available. However, the material required, particularly the breakers, is hard to get. I would estimate that less than 10% of my customers actually wire for the car chargers and we have many customers waiting for the needed breakers. If this becomes mandatory, there is no way the supply chains will keep pace. I have serious concerns that the electric grid can even handle the increased power demands. This should not be a mandated change for all.
