I dont agree with the forcefulness of having to buy a electric vehicle. A few years ago I traveled from my home in Delaware to visit family In Florida . During my trip I pasted through many small dirt poor towns. At that point I said to myself there is no way in these rual communities that these people live in could ever afford a electric car. Let alone there housing situation is that of Evis Presley (before the fame). With that being said there's to much for a family or person in that situation to take on , for one there house more then likely is not suitable to charge one of these vehicles let alone is their property valve probably the same price tag as the vehicle. So this makes sense at this point in time to not push the evenlope open any further. Things like this take time let's build the infrastructure first and then possibly we may be ready for a slow transition to the EV market but by choice not by mandating it. Thanks for reading
