Whenever I was in business & I established a deadline and/or release date (product introduction, software release, etc.) it was mandatory to outline the implementation plan on how I was to achieve that objective. Only government entities announce dates for their directives to take effect without any plans on how to accomplish their goal. The entire "green energy movement" follows the same process. Just announce a date for the elimination of gasoline powered cars & somehow it will happen. No need to outline an implementation plan with objectives and completion dates for those interim steps (charging stations, improvements to our electrical grid, source(s) of electrical power, etc.). Until the public sees a logical well thought out implementation plan there will be little or no support to eliminate gasoline powered automobiles.
