In all probability, everyone on this planet knows that eventually, fossil fuels will come to an end, either by exhaustion or mandate. However, this process will take time, for both technology and the world to catch up, especially in lesser developed countries. At this point in time, it seems extremely unfair that the current governmental administration is forcing it down the throats of its citizens, whether they agree with it or not. It is just not fair. EV is dependent on so much that the US cannot control while at the same time, filling the financial coffers of nations that are doing everything in their power to take this great nation of ours down. Also, vehicle cost, power charging, our electric infrastructure and length of individual trips between charging (car vs truck vs military) are still nowhere near perfected and probably won't be for some time to come. I truly believe that our nation is behind the need to eventually change to EV but not at the speed that is being forced on it.
