This is a foolish decision being made. Neither senior citizens on fixed incomes, nor the average person will be able to afford an electric vehicle or the maintenance of one. These requirements should be set back at least another 10 years until they figure out how to make a battery that can last longer than the ones they have now as well as being less expensive. That would probably bring the price of the cars down too. Only the upper income levels will be able to afford these vehicles. Plus the environment will be no better off because we are stripping the earth of more natural resources than gas powered cars as well as filling landfills with batteries than cannot be disposed of in an efficient way. This proposal to meet California standards is very very premature and not a common sense move on the part of Delaware.
