I don't believe that Delaware is ready for zero emissions vehicles. Does the state have an infrastructure plan and the capacity to charge all these vehicles that everyone will have? Just because California is going to do this doesn't mean Delaware has to. I don't believe we are ready to go all electric...even in 10 years. When the state can prove that they have the capacity or a plan to build out the capacity to charge all these vehicles plus supply the electricity that normally runs through our grid currently, then I might entertain the idea. No state has this capacity at this time or will in the near future. I think more time is needed to think about what direction the state wants to go in, instead of forcing this direction on all of us through rules and regulations.
