Fearmongering regarding wind energy are completely unfounded. I have been to Block Island every summer for 35 years. About 10 years ago, 5 windmills were placed near the island. They can't be seen from the mainland as Block Island is 13 miles off of the coast. The end result is that the windmills produce enough energy that the island is completely powered by wind energy now, and consistently sends surplus power back to the mainland. So while I believe that the windmills are aesthetically pleasing, the Maryland windmills will be so far out into the ocean, that they will be specs on the horizon; if you can see them at all. Contrary to the fearmongers, there has been no apocalypse to wildlife. So compare the monetary value of wind energy to the continuation of fossil fuel use. Oil platforms pollute our air and water. The use of fossil fuels pollutes our air, and depletes our ozone, contributing to global warming. Oil spills kill wildlife. So for our children and grandchildren, do the responsible thing and leave them with a cleaner planet. Wind energy is relatively free and creates zero pollution. Fearmongers need to stop being afraid of change.
