To Whom it May Concern;

I would like to go on record as being opposed to the State of Delaware adopting laws similar to those in California which eventually ban the sale of gas or diesel powered cars and trucks in the state. As if California hasn't shown the problems with this sort of legislation, why would Delaware with a much smaller population density want to consider such a restrictive issue for its citizens?

The free market system will award the manufacturers of electric vehicles when they have produced vehicles that meet the needs of drivers, and when the electric grid can handle such an increase in the demand. State mandates are not the answer.
